

CURRICULUM VITAE of GIACOMO ZAPPAROLI

Giacomo Zapparoli is graduated in biology and works as researcher of agricultural microbiology since 1999 at the University of Verona. His research and teaching activity concerns on applied microbiology, in particular the study of the microorganisms involved in food production processes. He studied the identification and the monitoring of microorganisms using classical and molecular methods, selection of microbial strains to use in industrial winemaking processes, and he investigated on physiology and metabolism of wine bacteria and yeasts. Recently his activity is focused on mycology, in particular fungal pathogens of grapevine.

He has cooperated with public authorities and institutions on viticulture and enological projects and with companies of enological products.

He is author of publications in international and national journals. He participated on congresses and technical meetings presenting communications and several posters regarding food microbiology.

He is teaching at study programs of bachelor and master's degree in biotechnology of University of Verona